MIND OVER MATTRESS!

"CRUSHED CRIME."

The thirty-fifth annual convention of the American Police Chiefs Association was coming to an end. There had been a series of talks by criminal lawyers, judges, crime experts and others. Just now every eye in the auditorium was focused upon a man who was sitting on the last chair on the platform stage. He was a mild looking man with rimless eyeglasses and a high forehead. He wore a gray flannel suit and looked like an executive. There was no need to mention his name. For every person present was well aware of Professor Max R. Cramer.

Police Chief Joseph Day arose from his seat and raised his hand for recognition. This was granted by Police Chief Ben Kent, the president of the American Police Chiefs Association.

"During the last few months there have been more than a dozen articles in various magazines about Professor Cramer," began Chief Kent. "Not one of those articles agrees upon the specific manner in which he can catch a criminal. I wonder if we could get him to clarify the matter?"

"Any objection on your part, Professor Cramer," asked Chief Kent, "to your answering the question? Or is it a matter of confidence that you do not wish to discuss?"

The professor arose from his chair and went up to the microphone. A thundering round of applause greeted him. It lasted for a full five minutes. He signaled and then there was quiet as he began to speak.

"What I have done and am doing at the present," he said in his calm low toned voice, "is something that can be done by any person willing to devote the necessary time and effort. First of all, I have trained my memory to a very high degree. In effect it has become a filing cabinet from which, in a second, I can mentally pull the necessary data about any given criminal or any type of crime. Second, I have trained my powers of observation to a very high point. It is the smallest detail which may escape the attention of a person that comes into my view and is used. Third, I am capable of making simple logical deductions from a given set of facts. Finally I have the desire to help rid this country of crime. Now let me show you right here how I operate."

He paused for a few seconds. Everyone became conscious that he was focusing his attention upon Police Chief Day.

"Our honored and respected police chief from Jefferson City did not want to stay away from this convention. Last week his wife gave birth to a nine pound baby boy. I read this in a newspaper. Our police chief is under a strain. I have noticed him tapping his fingers on the side of his seat. He should have been home but he is here. Why? Something very important brought him to this convention. The Stocking Band Gang has been operating in his territory. Unless something is done about the matter, there probably will be a new police chief in Jefferson City. He wants his job and he is a good man. So he came here to try to figure out how to induce me to come and help him. Before he asks it, I tell him I will be glad to be of assistance."

There was a look of astonishment on the police chief's face. Those around him smiled because they knew the professor had done a fine job of showing how he operated.

"Offer accepted with lots of thanks," half shouted Chief Day.

At the end of the convention, the professor returned to Jefferson City with the police chief. He made all necessary plans and waited for the Stocking Band Gang to strike.

"We have a good description of one bandit," said the professor. "And we know he has a weakness for mint and chocolate ice cream. The second bandit has a record and hence you have a picture of him. We know a pet phrase he likes to use. Why does the leader conceal his face? You feel to keep his identity secret from his victims. But I say to keep his identity a secret from the rest of the gang. Otherwise they would have all worn some kind of a mask."

At the end of two weeks there came the first break. The alarm came into police headquarters.

"They just held up the Mercantile State Bank," announced the police chief. "What do we do now?"

"Put into operation the plan I devised," explained the professor. "There are five highways out of the city. On each of these highways you have three police trucks. Send them the signal to setup road blocks. We know that the chances are these bandits do not leave the vicinity. They will feel confident that we are under the impression they did beat the road block. Now let us go into action."

The next evening in a large room of a secluded cabin a man was eating ice cream. Two other men were watching him.

"You certainly must like that combination of mint and chocolate ice cream, Dave," remarked one of the men.

"That's my one weakness," replied Dave Gardner who little realized it was also his doom.

For at that moment, John Goldberg, proprietor of the Ace Ice Cream Parlor was rereading a police notice he had received.

"Be on the lookout for a man about five feet eight, weighing about 145 pounds. Small scar over left eye. Likes mint and chocolate ice cream."

"Tessie," said John Goldberg to his wife, "that fellow was in here last night. I am going to call the police chief. Could be one of the bank robbers."

Five miles away a different scene was taking place. A large black sedan stopped in front of a service station. A thin nervous man got out of the driver's seat.

"Fill'er up," he ordered. "Double check the air in my tires. Be snappy about it. I'm in a hurry."

Sam Lasher did as he was told. He rang up the sale and then went inside his office. He looked at a police bulletin with a picture on it. Seemed to be the same man. There was a simple notation under the picture.

"Watch the language used by your customers. This man has the habit of saying: Fill'er up. Double check the air in my tires. Be snappy about it."

Sam Lasher did some quick thinking. He ran for his car and followed the black sedan to its destination. Then he returned and notified the police. An hour later they were near the cabin. The professor had a loud speaker unit set up. Then he spoke.

"You are all surrounded. We will give you two minutes to come out peacefully. Otherwise we come in after you."

"Keep quiet and do nothing," ordered the masked gang leader to the men inside. "I will wait for time. I am going to speak at the window." The gang leader opened the window slightly and shouted.

"We have a fortune in here. All in good United States Money. Attack us and it will be destroyed. Send the chief in and let me talk to him for two minutes. Then we surrender."

"Looks like an invitation to walk into a trap," suggested Police Chief Day.

"It is," replied Professor Cramer. "Tell him there will be two of us. We walk into the trap but keep our wits about us."

The masked leader faced the two men of the law. He was standing against a wall and held a revolver in his hand.

"You think you are smart, chief, calling in Professor Cramer to help you. I read about it in the papers. Watch this act."

In a split second the section of the wall moved aside and closed. The bandit leader was on the other side. The roar of a car could be heard.

"We've been double crossed," shouted one of the crooks. "He's got all the dough with him."

The gang leader had escaped by driving out in a small high powered foreign sport car and cutting over the hill. The car was abandoned and apparently the bandit leader continued in a second car hidden for just that purpose.

The professor went outside and gave orders over the mobile police wireless broadcasting unit.

"Be on the lookout for a woman driver. Fingernail of third left finger cracked. Search car for hidden money. Permit nobody to pass road blocks until you check each and every car."

At headquarters a rather pretty brown haired girl with eyes red from crying faced the police chief and the professor. She had been arrested at the road block. And a search showed the loot in her car.

"How did you figure the leader was a woman?" asked the police chief.

"It was simple," explained Professor Cramer. "The leader was wearing a double breasted blue suit. But it was buttoned on the left side and not on the right. Men button their jackets on the right side. A woman buttons it on the left side. A small detail I observed. Also that the fingernail of the third left finger was cracked. Small details, quick thinking, and crime has been crushed."
